PROPHETIC POLITICAL REGENERATION AND FAMILY LINEAGE HIERARCHY IN THE QUR'AN

Abstract

[The Political Regeneration of the Prophets in the Family Hierarchy in the Qur'an.] This study explores the relevance of Qur'anic interpretation in addressing contemporary This study examines the phenomenon of prophetic succession within the Qur'an, focusing on how political and spiritual leadership is transmitted across generations within prophetic families. The research is motivated by the scarcity of scholarly work addressing direct generational succession within the prophetic hierarchy itself, as well as by the broader social problem of dynastic politics in Indonesia, where power concentrated within a single family is often perceived as antithetical to democratic and meritocratic values. This study aims to (1) analyze the hierarchical structures of prophetic families as presented in the Qur'an, (2) classify prophetic political succession using the socio-political theories of Pierre Bourdieu (Capital Theory) and Talcott Parsons (Structural Functionalism), and (3) explain the moral values and practical implications of the prophetic model of succession for contemporary contexts. This research employs a qualitative, library-based method with a descriptive-analytical approach, drawing primarily on Qur'anic verses concerning the narratives of the prophets (qiṣaṣ al-anbiyā') and Tafsir Ath-Thabari, supported by relevant sociopolitical literature. The findings indicate that prophetic succession, as illustrated in the narratives of Abraham–Ishmael, Zachariah–Yahya, David–Solomon, and Moses– Aaron, is not a matter of mere biological inheritance but a meritocratic transmission of values, morality, and monotheistic mission (tawḥīd). Through Bourdieu's framework, this succession functions as a legitimate reproduction strategy grounded in cultural and symbolic capital, while Parsons' framework shows the prophetic family as an ideal latent subsystem for internalizing leadership values. The study concludes that prophetic caderization offers an ethical foundation and a direct antithesis to contemporary dynastic politics, emphasizing that family-based succession is legitimate only when it satisfies meritocratic criteria and embodies the prophetic qualities of Ṣhiddiq, Amānah, Tablīgh, and Faṭānah.

[Kaderisasi Politik Nabi pada Ruang Lingkup Hirarki Keluarga dalam Al-Qur'an] Penelitian ini mengkaji fenomena suksesi kenabian dalam Al-Qur'an, dengan fokus pada bagaimana kepemimpinan politik dan spiritual diwariskan lintas generasi dalam keluarga para nabi. Penelitian ini dilatarbelakangi oleh minimnya kajian akademik yang secara langsung membahas suksesi generasi dalam hirarki kenabian, serta permasalahan sosial yang lebih luas berupa politik dinasti di Indonesia, di mana kekuasaan yang terkonsentrasi pada satu keluarga kerap dipandang bertentangan dengan nilai-nilai demokrasi dan meritokrasi. Penelitian ini bertujuan untuk (1) menganalisis struktur hirarki keluarga para nabi sebagaimana digambarkan dalam AlQur'an, (2) mengklasifikasikan suksesi politik kenabian dengan menggunakan teori sosial-politik Pierre Bourdieu (Teori Kapital) dan Talcott Parsons (Fungsionalisme Struktural), serta (3) menjelaskan nilai-nilai moral dan implikasi praktis dari model suksesi kenabian bagi konteks kekinian. Penelitian ini menggunakan metode kualitatif berbasis kepustakaan (library research) dengan pendekatan deskriptif-analitis, yang bersumber utama pada ayat-ayat Al-Qur'an mengenai kisah para nabi (qiṣaṣ al-anbiyā') dan Tafsir Ath-Thabari, serta didukung oleh literatur sosial-politik yang relevan. Hasil penelitian menunjukkan bahwa suksesi kenabian, sebagaimana tergambar dalam kisah Ibrahim–Ismail, Zakariya–Yahya, Daud–Sulaiman, dan Musa–Harun, bukanlah semata-mata perkara pewarisan biologis, melainkan transmisi nilai, moralitas, dan misi tauhid yang bersifat meritokratis. Melalui kerangka teori Bourdieu, suksesi ini berfungsi sebagai strategi reproduksi yang sah karena berlandaskan pada modal budaya dan modal simbolik, sedangkan melalui kerangka teori Parsons, keluarga nabi berperan sebagai subsistem laten (latency) yang ideal dalam menginternalisasi nilai-nilai kepemimpinan. Penelitian ini menyimpulkan bahwa kaderisasi kenabian menawarkan fondasi etis sekaligus antitesis langsung terhadap fenomena politik dinasti kontemporer, dengan menegaskan bahwa suksesi berbasis keluarga hanya sah apabila memenuhi kriteria meritokratis dan mencerminkan sifat-sifat kenabian, yaitu Ṣhiddiq (kejujuran), Amānah (dapat dipercaya), Tablīgh (menyampaikan), dan Faṭānah (kecerdasan).

1. Introduction

The narratives of the prophets embedded within the Qur'an convey profound moral principles intended to serve as exemplary precedents for humanity. The examination of familial hierarchies in this study does not imply that prophetic status is merely inherited through biological lineage; rather, it highlights a deliberate transmission of values underpinning divine election. The qualifications governing this prophetic lineage are fundamentally meritocratic in nature.

Indonesia is widely recognized for the presence of dynastic politics, a phenomenon that predates the nation's independence and can be traced back to the era of pre-colonial kingdoms. As a democratic state, Indonesia formally attained its sovereignty in 1945; nevertheless, the transition to independence did not fully displace inherited patterns of power consolidation. Under the administration of Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono (SBY), Indonesia experienced a period of comparatively robust democratic governance. However, during the COVID-19 pandemic, the executive was granted expanded discretionary authority to implement emergency policy measures, a development that inadvertently fostered political favoritism and ultimately facilitated a transfer of power that further entrenched dynastic politics. Such practices illustrate a broader tendency for governance to deviate from principles of justice, fairness, and transparency as mandated in the Qur'an.

Within this context, the author examines how earlier prophets determined their successors through familial lineage, drawing on Tafsir Ath-Thabari Jāmi' al-bayān 'an ta'wīl to investigate the historical occasions of revelation (asbāb al-nuzūl) underlying these appointments. This study explores how prophets who were entrusted with prophethood educated their families, were subsequently designated as prophets themselves, and were applied as exemplary models (uswah ḥasanah) for contemporary Muslim communities, extending from the household level to positions of political leadership.

Accordingly, this study aims to analyze the narratives of the prophets through an integrative application of Pierre Bourdieu's and Talcott Parsons' sociological theories, examined against the backdrop of familial hierarchy, so that these narratives may serve as a legitimate model applicable to society at large, up to and including the highest levels of governmental leadership. It is hoped that this research will enrich the field of socio-political tafsir studies and offer an inspirational, constructive contribution to the cultivation of familial and societal leadership.

2. Literature Review

Scholarship on the familial hierarchy of the prophets within the Qur'an remains underdeveloped, both in the field of Qur'anic Studies and Exegesis and in Islamic Education studies more broadly. Existing research has predominantly focused on the struggles of Prophet Muhammad and his companions in safeguarding the faith, as well as on how the domestic conditions of the Prophet's household contributed to the preservation of Islam. Studies that directly address the familial dynamics of the prophets as a subject in their own right remain notably scarce.

Other existing studies tend to examine the narratives of individual prophets. Most commonly Prophet Muhammad that is primarily through the lens of 'aqīdah (theological doctrine), with minimal direct integration of socio-political analysis.

Accordingly, the present study occupies a markedly distinct position relative to prior research. This study examines how the prophets were selected through familial lineage by directly integrating the sociological theories of Pierre Bourdieu and Talcott Parsons, while simultaneously offering a constructive model for contemporary society and articulating a normative response to the phenomenon of dynastic politics.

2.1 Literature Review

This study is grounded in the sociological theories of Pierre Bourdieu and Talcott Parsons to analyze the phenomenon of prophetic succession within the Qur'an. Bourdieu's Theory of Capital, articulated primarily in Distinction: A Social Critique of the Judgement of Taste, posits that social hierarchy is shaped not solely by economic wealth but by four interrelated forms of capital: economic, social, cultural, and symbolic. Central to this framework are the concepts of reproduction strategy. the systematic practices through which families preserve their lineage and structural position across generations, and title of nobility, whereby inherited status confers legitimacy independent of demonstrated merit. This study employs Bourdieu's framework to examine how prophetic families transmit spiritual authority, knowledge, and prestige to their successors, and to assess whether such transmission constitutes a legitimate meritocratic process or an unearned inheritance of status.

Complementing this, Talcott Parsons' Structural Functionalism, particularly as developed in The Social System, provides a framework for understanding how individual roles are shaped by both external structural conditions and internal value orientations. Parsons' AGIL scheme, comprising Adaptation, Goal Attainment, Integration, and Latency. That explains how social systems maintain equilibrium through the functional coordination of interrelated subsystems. Of particular relevance to this study is the Latency function, which describes the family as the primary subsystem responsible for internalizing an actor's values, motivations, and civic orientation prior to their entry into broader social or political roles. Parsons further distinguishes between ascription (status assigned by birth) and achievement (status earned through demonstrated qualification), a distinction central to evaluating whether prophetic succession operates as pure lineage-based inheritance or as a merit-tested process.

Integrating these two frameworks, this study conceptualizes prophetic succession as a phenomenon that cannot be reduced to either purely biological inheritance or purely meritocratic selection, but rather as a synthesis of both. Bourdieu's cultural and symbolic capital explain how prophetic families accumulate and transmit legitimacy, while Parsons' Latency subsystem explains how such families function as the ideal environment for cultivating leadership values across generations. Together, these theories allow the present study to move beyond a purely textual or exegetical reading of the Qur'anic narratives, situating them instead within a broader sociological analysis of how legitimate authority is constructed, transmitted, and sustained within family structures.

This dual theoretical lens further serves a comparative and evaluative function: by establishing the conditions under which prophetic succession operates as a legitimate reproduction of capital and a properly functioning Latency subsystem, this study is positioned to draw a contrast with contemporary dynastic politics, wherein similar mechanisms of inherited capital and familial socialization are frequently mobilized without the corresponding tests of merit, spiritual integrity, and public accountability that characterize the prophetic model. This theoretical foundation thus underpins the study's broader aim of deriving normative insights applicable to the evaluation of hereditary political leadership in contemporary society.

2.2 Previous Research Studies

Although several prior studies have examined themes of succession, cadre regeneration, and prophetic family structures, none directly parallel the scope of the present research. This study distinguishes itself from existing scholarship by focusing specifically on the political dimension of prophetic succession as it manifests within family hierarchy in the Qur'an, analyzed through the dual sociological lenses of Pierre Bourdieu's Capital Theory and Talcott Parsons' Structural Functionalism. Whereas prior studies address household role integration, organizational cadre-building, or historical legal transformation, none apply a systematic socio-political theoretical framework to the phenomenon of direct generational succession within the prophetic hierarchy itself a gap this study seeks to fill by treating prophetic succession as a subject of sociological as well as exegetical analysis.

Muhammad Zainul Abidin's dissertation entitled "Integration of Domestic and Public Roles of the Family of the Prophet Muhammad PBUH in the Qur'an and Hadith" explains the double burden factor, This challenge is particularly pronounced for career-oriented mothers who experience significant friction in maintaining professional pursuits alongside domestic responsibilities toward their husbands and children. Abidin's study analyzes the household dynamics of the prophetic family as a normative model and benchmark for contemporary families navigating gendered double burdens, specifically as experienced by women.

Winda Zulfiana's thesis (2023) entitled "The Role of Cadres in Improving the Quality of Human Resources in the Srikandi Lintas Iman Yogyakarta Community" This study examines the succession efforts within SRILI (Srikandi Lintas Iman), an interfaith community based in Yogyakarta. As a relatively young organization, its internal leadership succession mechanisms are still developing. Nevertheless, amidst the ongoing disruptions of the COVID-19 pandemic, the research analyzes how SRILI's succession processes have sustained the community's operational continuity and resilience through changing societal conditions.

The journal article of Muhammad Thoyib and Muhammad Chairul Huda (2022) entitled "The Dynamics of Islamic Family Law: from Pre-Prophetic to the Prophetic Era" 3. This study explores the continuity and shift between pre-Islamic Arabian family structures and the Islamic family system. Given that the Prophet Muhammad (PBUH) was born in the Arabian Peninsula, pre-existing local cultural practices naturally exerted a significant influence on the development and codification of Islamic family law.

3. Methods

This study employs a descriptive-analytical method. The descriptive component is used to systematically categorize and present primary data derived from qiṣaṣ al-anbiyā' (narratives of the prophets) pertaining to prophetic succession. Subsequently, these narratives are critically analyzed through a socio-political approach to uncover underlying sacred patterns, thereby demonstrating how these divine models of succession offer normative guidance for humanity.

The data utilized in this study is qualitative in nature. This qualitative data focuses primarily on textual materials, specifically sociological theoretical frameworks and Quranic narrative texts related to the prophetic accounts. Additionally, the author incorporates exegetical insights (aqwāl al-mufassirīn) from classical and contemporary commentators to support and corroborate the analysis of these prophetic narratives.

3.1 Data Collection Techniques

The data utilized in this study is qualitative in nature. This qualitative data focuses primarily on textual materials, specifically sociological theoretical frameworks and Quranic narrative texts related to the prophetic accounts. Additionally, the author incorporates exegetical insights (aqwāl al-mufassirīn) from classical and contemporary commentators to support and corroborate the analysis of these prophetic narratives.

The primary source of data in this study is the Qur'an, which specifically the author will only take verses that explain the stories of the prophets as the main reference for prophetic regeneration research. Adapun sumber sekunder meliputi Tafsir Ath-Thabari Jāmiʻ al-bayān ʻan taʼwīl, Key socio-political works utilized in this study include: Prevention of Dynastic Politics through Affirmative Action: A Quranic Perspective (2026) by Dr. Farhan Ahsan Anshari, Lc., M.Ag.; Distinction: A Social Critique of the Judgement of Taste by Pierre Bourdieu (trans. Richard Nice); and The Social System by Talcott Parsons. These texts play a pivotal role in grounding the analytical 20 framework of this research, providing the requisite contextual depth and systematic structure. The author incorporates previous scholarly studies and journal articles that examine Quranic prophetic succession and analyze narrative accounts of the prophets (qiṣaṣ al-anbiyā'). These secondary sources serve to reinforce the literature base, thereby enhancing the scholarly rigor and analytical validity of this study..

The data collection technique employed in this thesis is a systematic documentation method suited to library-based research, comprising three procedural steps: first, categorizing relevant Qur'anic verses and prophetic traditions (aḥādīth) addressing socio-political succession within prophetic families; second, conducting a socio-historical contextualization of the grouped verses through Asbāb al-Nuzūl analysis drawn from Ath-Thabari's Jāmi' al-bayān 'an ta'wīl; and third, integrating these exegetical findings with Pierre Bourdieu's Theory of Capital and Talcott Parsons' Structural Functionalism to formulate the study's core conceptual themes..

3.2 Data Analysis Technique

This study utilizes a descriptive-analytical approach combined with a socio-political framework, structured through three interrelated stages of analysis..

The first stage, Socio-Historical Analysis, examines the historical occasions of revelation (asbāb al-nuzūl) embedded within prophetic narratives to investigate how mechanisms of succession unfold. Building on this, the second stage, Integrative Theoretical Analysis, systematically evaluates the gathered narrative accounts of the prophets against Pierre Bourdieu's Theory of Capital and Talcott Parsons' Structural Functionalism. Finally, the third stage, Contextual & Applied Analysis, synthesizes these findings to demonstrate the underlying divine patterns (sunnatullāh) present in prophetic succession, offering normative insights to address contemporary issues such as dynastic politics.

4. Result and Discussion

This chapter provides the results and discussion concerning the phenomenon of prophetic succession as portrayed within the Qur'an, beginning with a descriptive overview of how prophets were divinely appointed and how familial dynamics shaped the transmission of prophethood across generations. It then proceeds to a detailed discussion of the familial hierarchical system evident in four Qur'anic narratives which are Prophet Abraham and Prophet Ishmael, Prophet Zachariah and Prophet Yahya, Prophet David and Prophet Solomon, and Prophet Moses and Prophet Aaron. Examined through exegetical insights drawn from Tafsir Ath-Thabari. Building upon these narratives, the chapter presents an integrative theoretical analysis employing Pierre Bourdieu's Theory of Capital and Talcott Parsons' Structural Functionalism to elucidate how prophetic succession functioned as both a legitimate reproduction of capital and a properly balanced latent subsystem for the internalization of leadership values. Finally, this chapter concludes with a contextual and applied discussion, translating these findings into moral values and practical strategies relevant to contemporary Islamic leadership, including a normative response to the phenomenon of dynastic politics in present-day governance.

4.1 Descriptic Research Results

These results detail an investigation into Quranic narratives regarding how prophets were commissioned within the scope of the family. Integrated through the sociological perspectives of Talcott Parsons and Pierre Bourdieu, these findings serve as a framework for Islamic societal leadership and provide an analytical response to dynastic politics.

4.1.1 Prophetic Succession

Prophetic succession refers to the process by which a prophet is divinely chosen by Allah through revelation, a sacred appointment attested to throughout the narratives of the Qur'an. Allah executes a divine purpose for those elected to prophethood, as exemplified in the narrative of Prophet Mūsā (Moses). Amid a perilous situation, Mūsā's mother was commanded by Allah to place the infant Mūsā into the Nile River to protect him from execution by Pharaoh and his soldiers. Upon Mūsā's arrival at the royal palace, Pharaoh took an interest in him and instructed his wife, Āsiyah, to care for the child. Similarly, other Quranic narratives such as the story of Prophet ʻĪsā (Jesus) enshrined in the Qur'an highlight key theological events, including debates regarding his death and divinity in Christian belief, as well as his miraculous birth to Maryam (Mary), a woman untouched by any man.

The prophets were entrusted with a divine mission by Allah to deliver revelation to their respective communities. This message served as glad tidings, offering the promise of Paradise and salvation from Hellfire to those who adhered to its teachings. The prophetic narratives selected by the author reveal an underlying logic within the prophetic lineage: Prophet Mūsā (Moses) was uniquely spared from Pharaoh's decree of execution, while Prophet ʻĪsā (Jesus) demonstrated his prophetic status through his fatherless birth, tasked with reforming communal morality, confirming the Torah, and foretelling the advent of the final prophet, Muḥammad.

Broadly speaking, analyzing prophetic succession is essential for demonstrating the coherent progression of prophetic selection and applying its normative benefits within society. Because prophets function as uswah ḥasanah 23 (an excellent model), their actions serve as exemplary precedents for humanity to follow.

4.1.2 An Overview of Familial Dynamics in Prophetic Succession

A prophet is a messenger commissioned by Allah to convey divine revelation (da'wah) to his people. Prophets bring divine guidance that serves as glad tidings encouraging righteous deeds that lead to Paradise as well as warnings against transgression to escape Hellfire. Furthermore, a prophet is duty-bound to embody an uswah ḥasanah (an excellent moral role model) for his community.

Quranic narratives indicate that certain prophets received their prophetic mantle through familial lineages. Examples include Prophet Ibrāhīm (Abraham), who prayed for righteous progeny worthy of continuing the prophetic mission; Prophet Mūsā (Moses), who requested that his brother Hārūn (Aaron) be appointed to prophethood; Prophet Zakariyyā (Zechariah), who beseeched Allah for an heir to carry on his spiritual heritage; and Prophet Sulaymān (Solomon), who inherited prophetic authority from Prophet Dāwūd (David). However, this familial succession is often a subject of debate, as the transmission of prophetic leadership within lineage networks is sometimes used to legitimize or justify modern dynastic politics.

The author focuses on examining the divine wisdom and systemic patterns underlying Allah's selection of prophets based on biological lineage to inherit and carry forward the prophetic mission.

Ayat berikutnya adalah QS. An-Nisā' [4]: 29 yang menegaskan larangan memperoleh harta dengan cara yang batil. Dalam ayat ini, Al-Qur'an memberikan penekanan bahwa transaksi yang dibenarkan adalah transaksi yang dilandasi kerelaan kedua belah pihak. Prinsip tersebut menjadi dasar penting dalam menjaga kebebasan berakad, menghindari penipuan, serta menjamin keadilan dalam setiap aktivitas perdagangan.

4.2. Discussion

These results detail an investigation into Quranic narratives regarding how prophets were commissioned within the scope of the family. Integrated through the sociological perspectives of Talcott Parsons and Pierre Bourdieu, these findings serve as a framework for Islamic societal leadership and provide an analytical response to dynastic politics.

4.2.1 The Familial Hierarchical System of the Prophets in the Qur'an

The narratives of the prophets embedded within the Qur'an convey profound moral principles intended to serve as exemplary precedents for humanity. The examination of familial hierarchies in this study does not imply that prophetic status is merely inherited through biological lineage; rather, it highlights a deliberate transmission of values underpinning divine election. The qualifications governing this prophetic lineage are fundamentally meritocratic in nature.

However, the existence of a familial hierarchy in the selection of prophets often intersects with broader social status phenomena. In contemporary contexts, various individuals or groups attempt to justify their social or political authority through spiritual claims of pious lineage, drawing parallels to prophetic families. To address this, the author examines the Quranic mechanisms through which prophets received their prophetic status within their respective families, illustrating the underlying wisdom and normative benefits embedded in these narratives.

In the book of Ath-Thabari, Abu Ja'far is said that the meaning of عَهْدِيْ refers to prophethood, stated in the narration 'Moses narrated to me, Amr narrated to us, from As-Suudi, he said, namely, 'My promise is My prophethood.' Other opinions such as Al-Mutsanna, Ibn Basysyar, Ahmad bin Ishaq, Musyrif bin Aban, Al Haththab, Muhammad bin Hubaib Al Muharibi, Al Qasim, Ibn Juraij, Muhammad bin Sa'id, stated that the word has the meaning of imam because the unrighteous themselves would not deserve to be called believers. Other opinions such as Bisyr bin Mu'adz, Al Hasan bin Yahya, Al Mutsanna, Ammar, Yahya bin Ja'far stated that the word has the meaning of security and tranquility.

Prophet Abraham supplicated to his Lord that leadership (imāmah) be granted to his descendants, with Prophet Ishmael becoming the first among his progeny to be divinely appointed to prophethood. Prophet Ibrāhīm's request was motivated by a desire to ensure the continuity of the monotheistic mission (tawḥīd) for future generations. Notably, his supplication reflected an underlying ethical boundary: Abraham did not request leadership indiscriminately for all his offspring, but specifically for those worthy of spiritual stewardship. In response, Allah SWT clarified the meritocratic nature of this divine covenant, stating: "Lā yanālu ʻahdī alẓālimīn" ("My covenant does not extend to the wrongdoers).

The religious foundation during the era of Prophet Zachariah was in a state of precariousness, leaving him deeply concerned about the future preservation of the faith he had preached to his people. Troubled by the prospect that his community might abandon these religious principles, he supplicated to Allah to grant him descendants who could safeguard the faith. His request was driven not by a mere desire for biological lineage, but by an acute and significant necessity to ensure the ongoing preservation of religion for subsequent generations. Allah answered his prayer by bestowing a child upon him through his barren wife a righteous son whom they named John (Yahya). In the book of Ath-Thabari it is said that the sentence The inheritance of the inheritance of the people of Ya'qub According to Abu Kuraib, Mujahid bin Musa, Ya'qub, Muhammad bin Amr, Al-Qasim, Al Hasan bin Yahya, Abu Kuraib, Bisyr, Musa bin Harun have similar opinions in their meaning, namely inheritance in the form of property, prophethood, and knowledge.

The incident of Prophet Sulaiman and Prophet Dawud is usually used as the reason for the presence of dynastic politics, Prophet Solomon was endowed with advantages after inheriting it from Prophet Dawud, this is explained in verse. Sulaiman inherited things that were not generally related to politics alone, but things like science and prophethood. The important thing inherited from Prophet Sulaiman here is not the political power to maintain the power of the family, but the prophetic treatise that must be defended in da'wah to the ummah after him.

Prophet Moses and Prophet Aaron have a pattern of family regeneration that is different from the general, the previous relationship of this prophetic family regeneration came from the father to the son, but this Prophet Moses asked Allah to make Aaron a Prophet where the Prophet Aaron here is a younger brother of the Prophet Moses. In the book Ath-Thabari, Al-Qasim from Al-Husayn, from Hajjaj, from Ibn Juraij he narrates, Ibn Abbas said, "Aaron is greater than Moses AS.

4.2.2 Analysis of Pierre Bourdieu's Theory of Capital and Talcott Parsons' Theory of Structural Functionalism on Familial Hierarchy in the Qur'an

The Qur'an provides comprehensive guidance directing humanity toward the path of Allah, fostering spiritual salvation and ultimate reward in the Hereafter. However, certain passages possess nuanced dimensions that remain elusive when subjected to superficial reading without rigorous contextual investigation. Within the discipline of Qur'anic exegesis ('ilm al-tafsīr), the interpretation.

Within the discipline of tafseer, societal phenomena can be critically analyzed through an integrative and contextual approach. Under this methodology, the Qur'an as a sacred text providing moral and spiritual orientation for humanity is conceptualized not merely as a static normative narrative, but as a dynamic, living response to complex social realities. Consequently, the exegete (mufassir) plays a pivotal role in contextualizing societal dynamics within the textual framework of the Qur'an and Sunnah. Nevertheless, this interpretive process necessitates strict methodological constraints to govern the exegete's analytical lens, recognizing that interpreters inevitably engage scripture through their respective ideological presuppositions.

The tafseer analysis of the Quranic narratives presented in this study is operationalized through the theoretical frameworks of prominent sociologists, namely Pierre Bourdieu and Talcott Parsons. Bourdieu's theoretical perspective elucidates how social structures manifest an intrinsic hierarchical system that implicitly governs social dynamics and practices. Meanwhile, Talcott Parsons' framework demonstrates how individual roles within a social system are conditioned by both internal and external environmental factors, an analytical dimension examined here through his AGIL scheme (Adaptation, Goal Attainment, Integration, and Latency).

Vol. xx No. x, 20xx, xx-xx

Applying Bourdieu's Theory of Capital, the Qur'anic prophetic narratives are analyzed through four interrelated forms of capital, each explaining a different dimension of how prophetic authority was constructed and transmitted across generations.

Symbolic Capital refers to the inherent prestige and sanctity attached to the prophetic name, which prophets used not for worldly gain but to demonstrate trustworthiness and cultivate public conviction in their divine mission. Prophet Zachariah's wish for his son Yahya to inherit prophethood exemplifies this, as it ensured the continuity of Allah's guidance at a time when his teachings had gained little following. Similarly, Prophet Solomon's inheritance from Prophet David, and the prophetic recognition given to Moses through Abraham's lineage, both functioned to validate authority and consolidate legitimacy in the face of opposition, such as Pharaoh's rule.

Cultural Capital encompasses the specialized knowledge, ethical values, and governance competencies transmitted from one prophet to the next. Prophet David's bequest to Solomon exemplifies this, as it carried not merely material inheritance but the "spiritual reproduction" of values and virtue across generations. Likewise, Prophet Aaron's linguistic eloquence served as a distinct cultural asset that strengthened Prophet Moses' da'wah, functioning as a kind of "trademark" enabling him to engage effectively with Pharaoh's elite court.

Social Capital concerns the honor, connections, and status a family accrues and transmits to secure its socio-political standing. Bourdieu's notion that "aristocracy is the excellence of precocity" is reflected in Solomon's inheritance from David, which guaranteed his position through pre-established familial honor. Likewise, the alliance between Moses and Aaron combined kinship and reputation to strengthen their shared resistance against Pharaoh's monopoly on power.

Economic Capital, in this context, extends beyond monetary wealth to include inherited property, titles, and the strategic "mastery of time" they confer. Prophet Ibrahim's moral and intellectual formation of his descendants exemplifies this advantage, providing greater legitimacy than power granted without lineage. Similarly, Solomon's inheritance from David is framed by Bourdieu's concept of "things from the past" property, names, and titles as tools for mastering time and reinforcing da'wah.

Together, these four forms of capital demonstrate that prophetic succession was not a simple transfer of biological status, but a structured process of accumulating and legitimizing authority. Sanctity (symbolic), knowledge and values (cultural), honor and alliance (social), and inherited strategic advantage (economic), all of which reinforced the successor's capacity to sustain the prophetic mission.

Bourdieu's concept of Reproduction Strategy explains how prophets ensured the continuity of their mission across generations, even beyond their own lifetimes. Prophet Ibrahim's plea that his descendants continue his journey, and Prophet Zachariah's request for a son to carry forward his da'wah, both exemplify this strategy though notably, what they sought to preserve was not material wealth but their prophetic mission itself, which Bourdieu terms "spiritual nobility" passed down as inheritance. Prophet Yahya's reception of a noble title, functioning as a precondition for symbolic capital, illustrates this transmission in practice.

This reproductive logic is further evident in the inheritance received by Prophet Solomon from Prophet David, which combined multiple forms of capital and was reinforced by acceptance from delegations among established families. This complex accumulation of capital freed Solomon from what Bourdieu calls the "labor of acquisition," granting him a legitimate and self-assured position of authority within his kingdom's politics that is consistent with Bourdieu's broader observation that inheritance functions to "maintain or increase assets and, consequently, improve position.

Complementing this, the Title of Cultural Nobility refers to the socially sanctioned prestige granted to descendants of a revered lineage, rooted in the belief that this inherited essence precedes and exceeds its outward manifestation in da'wah. Prophet Solomon's inheritance from Prophet David exemplifies this principle, functioning as a "natural extension of divine and royal order" that legitimized his authority through hierarchical and spiritual prestige rather than achievement alone.

Applying Parsons' Structural Functionalism, the prophetic narratives are analyzed through five interrelated mechanisms explaining how succession sustained social stability and functional equilibrium across generations.

Stability through Ascriptive Allocation explains prophetic succession through Parsons' concept of "allocation of personnel," particularly the biological strategy of ascription, status determined by birth. This functions as a primary rationale because tradition validates the expectation that commitment and vision will transfer naturally to capable offspring; had this allocation instead been opened to the general public, the resulting competition would likely have disrupted ancient social order. Yet ascription alone was insufficient: Prophet Abraham's request for prophetic leadership among his descendants was granted only conditionally, since "My covenant does not extend to the wrongdoers". illustrating Parsons' complementary concept of achievement, whereby inherited status remained contingent on the successor's demonstrated qualifications. This dual logic is likewise visible in Zachariah's plea for Yahya's succession and in the cooperative division of roles between Moses (as authoritative confronter of Pharaoh) and Aaron (as communicator), where lineage and functional competence operated together rather than in isolation.

Optimized Socialization and Internalization of Values highlights the family as the primary site of moral and educational formation, more effective than any external institution in cultivating prophetic character. Because a prophet's descendants are continuously immersed in prophetic teaching within the domestic sphere, they are uniquely positioned to internalize the discipline required for da'wah. However, this familial advantage was not unconditional: Parsons' framework clarifies that individuals who committed wrongdoing (ẓālimūn) were categorically excluded from prophetic status, meaning succession was reserved only for descendants who preserved exceptional spiritual and moral integrity as demonstrated in Ibrahim's lineage, where prophetic status was granted to a select few rather than automatically to all.

Routinization of Charismatic Authority describes how the religious and social order established by a prophet needed to be preserved through an orderly transmission process, typically from father to son, contingent on merit. This generational transfer institutionalized prophetic authority into a stable social structure, evident in the continuation of Ibrahim's preaching role through his descendants, and in Solomon's succession of David's leadership, which (drawing on Parsons' reading of Max Weber) required routinized transmission to preserve peace and prevent a rupture in prophetic continuity after David's death.

Integration of "Problem Meaning" and System Equilibrium frames hereditary succession as a corrective mechanism against the "problem of meaning". The existential uncertainty, perceived injustice, or unverified spiritual claims that arise when leadership lacks a clear line of continuity. Without structured succession, a leadership vacuum invites social conflict; hereditary transmission instead preempts this fallout while reinforcing public trust in divine justice. This is illustrated in Yahya's succession, which resolved the tension born from the injustice Zachariah experienced and restored equilibrium, and similarly in Solomon's inheritance from David, which preserved balance within the kingdom's leadership without disruption.

Reinforcement of Collectivity-Orientation shows that prophetic succession was not merely a matter of individual selection but carried deep communal and symbolic significance rooted in kinship. The chosen successor inherited not just family lineage but a profound responsibility to fulfill collective expectations, principally the continuation of da'wah while the familial model itself strengthened relational networks, provided mutual motivation, and streamlined consensus in adversity. This dynamic is evident in the emotional and social support Zachariah's household provided to Yahya, and in the trust placed in Aaron as Moses' partner in confronting Pharaoh, which reinforced Moses' resolve and helped sustain equilibrium even under the pressure of a demanding prophetic mission.

Taken together, these five mechanisms demonstrate that, within Parsons' framework, prophetic succession functioned as a structurally balanced system, one that combined inherited status with rigorous internal qualification, institutionalized authority without severing it from merit, and preserved both individual legitimacy and collective social stability across generations.

4.2.3 Contextual Strategies and Moral Values of Prophetic Political Succession for Contemporary Implementation

The discussion for this research is to analyze the strategic insights derived from integrating Pierre Bourdieu's and Talcott Parsons' theories regarding the familial hierarchies of the prophets. The author subsequently operationalizes these findings to establish exemplary paradigms for Islamic leadership and formulate critical perspectives on dynastic politics.

The Prophet is known as a prophet who is Shiddiq, Amanah, Tablig, and Fathanah. These qualities are the key to us determining the right leader, so we only need to emphasize the nature of the apostle so that it becomes a guideline for leaders of the current era by integrating it with today's problems. The nature of shiddiq that emphasizes awareness for the leader 43 and transparency that continues to be open, the nature of trust by healing the situation of the country itself with the ideas and ideas that he proposes along with the help of his cabinets and listing the consequences if something fatal happens from the actions of the leader, tabligh by continuing to listen to the advice of the people towards this country and conveying the concept as a form of his aspirations from the transparency that has been It was stated that a leader must be observant of the problems and developments of this country.

Read through Bourdieu's Capital Theory, the qualities of ethical leadership outlined above transparency, attentiveness, and empathetic responsiveness can be understood as mechanisms for accumulating legitimate symbolic capital rather than inherited or unearned symbolic capital. Bourdieu distinguishes symbolic capital that is genuinely recognized by a field (earned through demonstrated competence and public trust) from symbolic capital that persists merely through misrecognition of inherited status as though it were merit. A contemporary leader who practices transparency and listens to the community is, in effect, continuously re-legitimizing their symbolic capital in the eyes of the public field, rather than relying on a fixed reserve of inherited prestige. Applied to the Indonesian democratic context, this means that leadership legitimacy should be treated as a renewable relationship between leader and society field, sustained through the Faṭānah-driven exercise of transparent judgment, rather than a static inheritance conferred by family name or prior position precisely the mechanism that allows dynastic politics to entrench itself when left unchecked.

Viewed through Talcott Parsons' AGIL scheme, the leadership qualities outlined above can be understood as functional requirements for 44 restoring balance across a society's subsystems, rather than as isolated moral virtues. Transparency and attentiveness to the community correspond to the Integration function, as they harmonize the leader's Goal Attainment role that is government with the norms and expectations circulating through the broader social system, preventing the friction that arises when political authority operates independently of public consensus. Meanwhile, a leader's foresight and observance of unfolding problems reflect the Adaptation function, ensuring that governance remains responsive to changing societal conditions rather than rigidly selfreferential. The prophetic qualities of Ṣhiddiq, Amānah, Tablīgh, and Faṭānah are not merely personal ethics but structural mechanisms for keeping the political subsystem functionally aligned with the values instilled by the Latency subsystem (family, education, and religious institutions). In the Indonesian context, where democratic accountability functions as the primary integrative mechanism between state and society, Parsons' framework suggests that ethical leadership modeled on prophetic qualities serves as a corrective force: it re-anchors political authority to societal consensus and public trust.

Leadership requirements with the presentation of applicable legal principles can not only be applied to the state, but they can be applied in certain communities. Families are not allowed to enter the leadership if the family conditions are not included in the leadership requirements. Dynastic Politic should be legally to follow the terms of Monarchy rather than Democracy. Monarchical leadership can be carried out through what the moral message conveys in the stories of the prophets if the requirements of family can enter the requirements of their leadership. Dynastic politics is not only in the name of a status like a Monarchy as legal proof that leadership falls to absolute family status, even though the position of government is monarchical, but the holder of this power can stand as a mascot. If there are several envoys who are able to place their position as one in the cabinet to the leadership of it, then Include meritocracy in it, the system carried out.

Bourdieu's Theory of Capital offers a critical lens for formulating a response to dynastic politics, particularly through his observation that dominant families sustain power not through merit but by converting inherited social capital (family name, network, prestige) into symbolic capital (public legitimacy and perceived right to lead), a conversion that typically escapes scrutiny because society misrecognizes (méconnaissance) inherited capital as earned merit. Rather than rejecting family-based capital outright, the appropriate response is to interrupt this uncritical conversion by requiring that inherited capital be independently tested through transparent, competency-based mechanisms before it can translate into symbolic authority, a pattern already modeled in the prophetic narratives, where figures such as Ishmael, Isaac, Yahya, and Solomon were tested through trials of faith, patience, or submission before their inherited position was affirmed as legitimate. Applied to dynastic politics, this suggests the most effective institutional response is establishing independent, merit-based verification bodies (election commissions, ethics councils, public accountability mechanisms) to test whether inherited capital corresponds to genuine competence, rather than allowing it to be tacitly self-legitimating.

Talcott Parsons' Structural Functionalism, particularly the AGIL scheme, offers a complementary institutional response. Parsons holds that a stable social system depends on the functional balance of Adaptation, Goal Attainment, Integration, and Latency; dynastic politics represents a distortion of the Latency function, wherein the family which should cultivate an actor's internal values and civic orientation is, instead redirected toward narrow familial ambition. This corrupted Latency produces political actors oriented toward private interest rather than public mandate, which subsequently undermines Integration, as governance built on familial loyalty fails to harmonize competing institutional spheres.

Accordingly, an appropriate response following Parsons' logic must be systemic rather than merely legal or procedural: since dynastic politics originates as a failure of Latency, restoring equilibrium requires reinforcing the socializing institutions through family, education, and religious institutions, so that prospective leaders are oriented toward public accountability before ever reaching political office. This mirrors the prophetic pattern, in which succession functioned correctly only because the prophetic household (the Latency subsystem) successfully instilled tawḥīd-oriented values and moral responsibility prior to the successor's assumption of leadership, in contrast to dynastic politics, where a failed Latency subsystem produces successors driven by inherited entitlement rather than internalized public duty

5. Conclusion

Based on the research findings regarding prophetic caderization within the political hierarchy of prophetic families, this study concludes that the succession of authority and divine message (risālah) among the prophets, as evidenced in the narratives of Abraham–Ishmael, Zachariah–Yahya, David–Solomon, and Moses–Aaron. Its not a matter of mere biological inheritance, but a highly meritocratic transmission of values, morality, and the monotheistic mission (tawḥīd), evaluated through the successor's spiritual integrity and readiness to bear communal responsibility. Analyzed through Pierre Bourdieu's Capital Theory, this succession functions as a legitimate reproduction strategy grounded in Cultural Capital (knowledge and wisdom) and Symbolic Capital (sanctity and prestige), granting the successor immediate legitimacy and moral authority; through Talcott Parsons' Structural Functionalism, the prophetic family likewise operates as the optimal latent subsystem (Latency) for internalizing leadership values, combining ascription with rigorous achievement to preserve social equilibrium. Taken together, these findings position prophetic caderization as both an ethical foundation and a direct antithesis to contemporary dynastic politics: while Islam does not categorically prohibit family-based leadership continuity, it conditions such continuity on meritocratic qualification, the successor's endurance of spiritual trials, and the embodiment of Ṣhiddiq, Amānah, Tablīgh, and Faṭānah, standards that contemporary dynastic politics typically inverts by allocating power through biological proximity and unverified inherited capital, ultimately shifting governance away from public service (maslahah al-ummah) toward familial and oligarchic gratification, and producing the systemic corruption and institutional decay frequently observed in dynastic political systems.

Academically, this study serves as a reference for the Department of Quranic Studies and Exegesis (Ilmu Al-Qur'an dan Tafsir), particularly for inquiries intersecting with socio-political issues. Pierre Bourdieu's Theory of Capital and Talcott Parsons' Structural Functionalism offer alternative theoretical lenses through which to examine societal socio-political dynamics, demonstrating that these systems encompass not only the operational flexibility of government and society, but also structural hierarchies and internal and external variables.

Practically, the divine patterns of prophetic succession identified in this study offer actionable insights. In reality, a nation's progress hinges upon its leadership. In Indonesia, where Muslims constitute the majority, effective governance de facto requires leadership rooted in prophetic teachings. Consequently, this research aims to inform and inspire leaders within our community to embody high moral integrity and a commitment to consultative governance.

6. Expressions of Gratitude

The author expresses sincere gratitude to Almighty Allah for His grace, guidance, and blessings, which enabled the successful completion of this research titled "The Political Regeneration of the Prophets in the Family Hierarchy in the Qur'an".

Deep appreciation is extended to all parties who provided support, assistance, and valuable contributions throughout the research process. Special gratitude is owed to the thesis advisor(s) for their continuous guidance, insightful feedback, and constructive input during the development of this study. The author also acknowledges the academic support provided by the Institut Agama Islam Persis Bandung (IAIPI) Bandung, specifically the Faculty of Ushuluddin and the Department of Qur'anic Studies and Tafseer.

May this research offer meaningful contributions to Qur'anic tafseer, specifically regarding prophetic familial structures and their implications for socio-political frameworks within Quranic narratives.
